PRELIMINARY OBSERVATIONS.

Whether the Chicago saloon is a necessary institution, or whether it is a nuisance, does not admit of a doubt; and the only question is, how can it be best regulated. It is clear that the only remedy for the evils of intemperance, and the only means of preventing the sale of liquor to children, is to be found in the enforcement of the law. The Police Commissioners have the power to close every saloon in the city, and they have the power to keep them closed. The Mayor has the power to revoke the licenses of all saloons which violate the law, and he has the power to prevent the granting of licenses to those who are known to be habitual violators of the law. The Police Commissioners and the Mayor have the power to do all this, and they have the power to do it at once. If they do not do it, it is because they do not choose to do it. If they do not do it, it is because they are willing that the saloons should remain open on Sunday, and that children should be allowed to enter them. If they do not do it, it is because they are willing that the saloons should be run in violation of the law. If they do not do it, it is because they are willing that the saloons should be run in violation of the law. TIT-BITS

JOHN CUTTS SECRET.

"Is Mr. Cutts in?" asked a short, somewhat shy, dark-haired man at a house in Queen Anne's Gate, Westminster, one afternoon in the autumn of 1879.

"Yes, I believe he will be. Mr. Cutts does not generally go out at this time of day. Will you walk this way, please?" and the footman led the visitor into a small room on the ground floor, and left him there.

Mr. Cutts was a well-known man in the literary world, and his house was a favourite resort of many of its members. Whether this was owing to the fact that Mrs. Cutts was a clever and charming woman, or that Mr. Cutts was a clever and charming man, I cannot say; but I am inclined to think that the latter was the case, for Mrs. Cutts, though undoubtedly a very lovely woman, was not a woman of many words, whereas her husband was a most brilliant conversationalist, and could talk on almost any subject with equal ease and fluency.

Mr. Cutts was a man of about forty-five years of age, and had been married for about twenty years to a lady who was considerably younger than himself. They had no children, and lived entirely for each other. Mr. Cutts was a man of considerable means, and had a charming house in Queen Anne's Gate, and a delightful country place near Hampton Court, where he and his wife spent the greater part of the summer months.

Mr. Cutts was a man of very refined tastes, and was a great collector of rare books, pictures, and china. His house was filled with treasures of this description, and he was never happier than when showing them to his friends.

The visitor, who had been shown into the room by the footman, was a young man of about twenty-five years of age, named Arthur Hamilton. He was a barrister, but had not yet succeeded in getting any practice, and was therefore obliged to supplement his income by writing for the papers. He had been introduced to Mr. Cutts by a friend, and had been asked to call on him whenever he was in town.

Hamilton looked round the room with interest, as he had never been in it before, and was examining a beautiful piece of Sèvres china, when Mr. Cutts entered.

"Ah, Hamilton, how do you do?" he said, shaking hands with his visitor. "I am very glad to see you. I have been wishing to have a chat with you for some time past, but I have been so busy that I have had no time to write to you. Now, however, I am at your service for the rest of the afternoon, and we can have a good talk over old times. Let me see, it is nearly two years since you left Oxford, is it not?"

"Yes, sir, it is," replied Hamilton.

"Well, and what have you been doing with yourself since then?" asked Mr. Cutts.

"Oh, I have been reading for the Bar, and writing a little, and amusing myself generally," replied Hamilton.

"Writing a little, eh? What sort of writing?" asked Mr. Cutts.

"Oh, I have written a little for the papers, and I have also written a little book," replied Hamilton.

"Indeed! I should like to see it," said Mr. Cutts. "Have you got a copy with you?"

"Yes, I have," replied Hamilton, producing a small volume from his pocket and handing it to Mr. Cutts.

"Thank you," said Mr. Cutts, taking the book from him. "I will look at it after you have gone, and will write and tell you what I think of it."

"I wished a little sensible talk for a change," said Mr. Cutts, "and I remember his very words. 'Please say the favourite will probably collapse,' he added, 'and that I recommend it to keep away.' Such a recommendation! It is the owner of Schiller's estate, and he thinks to lend me his old Thompson were a thing to be proud of. If he should ever be induced to part with it, and will let me have it, I will give him a good price for it. Then there is Goethe, and a description he gave me of having heard Mozart play on the same instrument, which would be the first capture of Constantinople, the most brilliant one; Goethe had been to see Napoleon before the day, and found the great man in his study, and after a few words had passed between them, Napoleon said, 'Now, Goethe, I will show you that I am not only a great soldier, but a great statesman,' and he sat down and played a sonata of Mozart's in a most masterly manner. Napoleon was a great musician, and I have always considered that Mozart's music was the most suitable for him. Then there is Beethoven, who was a great friend of Goethe's, and who composed the music to his play of Egmont. Then there is Haydn, who was a friend of Goethe's, and who composed the music to his play of Faust. Then there is Weber, who was a friend of Goethe's, and who composed the music to his play of Preciosa. Then there is Mendelssohn, who was a friend of Goethe's, and who composed the music to his play of Antigone. One list of it is greatly terrified Cutts.

"And see the great Achilles upon us anon."

"Yes, very true," said Thackeray, with a sarcastic laugh, "and I have no doubt that Mr. Cutts will be very glad to see you, and will be very much obliged to you for your visit. Now, Cutts, I must be off. Good-bye, my dear fellow, and mind you come and see me soon."

"Good-bye, Thackeray," said Mr. Cutts, shaking hands with him. "I will look you up one of these days, and will write to you about your book."

"Good-bye, Cutts," said Thackeray, and he left the room.

"Now, Hamilton, I am at your service," said Mr. Cutts, when the door had closed behind Thackeray. "I am very glad to see you, and I am
